We rounded up ten contributors and editors to dish the secrets on their all-time favorite destinations. Here's the list of places around the world that they came up with.

Corocora Camp (Corocora Camp)

Yellowstone safari glamping (Collective Retreats and Natural Habitat Adventures)

#20. Wyoming

Scraping leftovers into a compost pile might not sound like a vacation activity, but on Natural Habitat Adventures' new seven-day Yellowstone safari, composting is as essential to the experience as camping or hiking. While expert naturalists guide you in search of bison and wolf pups, you'll also be on an industry-first zero-waste expedition. You'll drink from reusable water bottles and dine on locally sourced food sans single-use plastics like straws, plates, and cups. Everything that can't be composted or recycled locally is hauled back to the company's headquarters in Boulder, Colorado, to be recycled, upcycled, or handed off to TerraCycle, an innovative company that specializes in the reuse of otherwise unprocessable waste. The hope is that the trip will inspire you with the landscape and wildlife while fostering habits you can take home. From $5,695 —S.P.

Patagonia (Upscape)

#12. Chile

The austere mountains, turquoise rivers, and wind-whipped steppe of northern Patagonia feels a lot farther off the grid than famed Torres del Paine National Park in Chile's southern tip. Get even deeper into the steppe with South American outfitter Upscape, which offers fly-fishing, photography, and trekking trips March through April (the end of austral summer) at a pop-up camp on the Jeinimeni River. Just yards from the Argentinean border, Upscape's remote camp has 300-square-foot tents with sleeping quarters and a living room, and a communal dining tent for meals of perfectly grilled carne asada. Not that you'll spend much time there with the monster brown and rainbow trout to be stalked, sunsets behind craggy peaks to be captured, and glacial valleys and alpine lakes to be explored. From $3,950 for five days —S.P.
